

Overview:

Of 216 students who completed their PhDs over the 2010-2019 time period, 95% (206) of them were employed. The remaining ten people include several students (law, etc), several unemployed, and several with their status in flux at the completion of the data collection effort.

Of 206 employed PhD graduates, 172 (or 83% of those employed) work in some kind of academic employment. The other 34 graduates are split between non-profit, government, and business employment. These categories sometimes are difficult to parse, and some of the non-profit positions (with research centers or historical societies) might be better categorized as academic.
